

Participants tell stories about the Green Line

During August, more than 30 people enjoyed two PhotoVision workshops as part of Community Corridor Planning. The project, which was on-going throughout the summer, uses photography to think in different ways about the impact the extension the Green Line will have on Somerville. Participants took pictures that tell stories about what they like about Somerville, and of what their hopes and fears are for Somerville's future. Many of these photos were on display during the workshops, and participants had fun meeting the other photographers, hearing about their experiences taking photos, and discussing what they liked about each photo. Photographer Anh Đào Kolbe and summer intern Abi Vladeck led the groups in a discussion of how to take compelling photos, and the participants left excited and ready to keep taking pictures. You'll have a chance to see the pictures at the upcoming meeting on October 27th.
